In general, graduate courses foster potential scholars in legal sciences. There are two courses: the Master's Course and the Ph.D. Course. A graduate student is required to study further a specialized area of law. All the courses provided in the Department of Law are dedicated to the education of a new generation of scholars and specialists with independent research capability and international competitiveness to meet social and educational needs.

Graduate students are required to write a thesis of their own specialty under the appropriate guidance of their advising professors. In the course of graduate studies, the following methodology is usually employed:

- study both civil law and common law in a comparative manner;
- study the basic elements of law including philosophical, social and historical background of legal phenomena;
- enhance the presentation and debating capabilities; and
- participate in seminars and dissertation sessions open to the public.

Degree Requirements

- At least 24 course units of graduate studies in law are required for a Master's degree while 60 course units including the credits obtained in the master's degree course are necessary for a Ph.D. degree.
- Students must pass the qualifying examination.
- Students have to write a thesis under the guidance of an advising professor and pass the oral dissertation before the evaluation committee.

Courses

In general, the graduate courses are established for both the master's and doctoral degree. One difference is the broad group of studies for the master's course while specialized subjects are provided to the Ph.D. applicant-students.

Master's degree course: Public law, Private law, Criminal law, Basic Legal Science.
